This fascinating collection of original essays seeks to address the possibilities and dangers of young people's transnational, commodified identities; how society and educational institutions might respond to these new identities; and the youth's ability to resist and transform these identities. It brings together contributions from leading scholars and practitioners from around the world, providing a comprehensive and up-to-date report on the state of the field. The book's editors are leading experts in the field of education, and the contributors come from a variety of disciplinary backgrounds, including sociology, anthropology, history, and political science. The book covers a wide range of topics, including the history of education and the Cold War, the political economy of education, the history of educational reform, and the history of educational policy. The book's editors and contributors provide a rich and diverse set of perspectives on the history of education, and the book is an invaluable resource for anyone interested in the history of education and the Cold War.
gender bias, and an increased risk to be radicalised and involved in extremism and related violence. On the other hand, it is shown that young people are resilient, and they have a remarkable ability to adapt and cope with extremely difficult situations. This ambivalence is vividly illustrated by a number of studies in countries as varied as Ethiopia, Zambia, South Africa, Botswana, Brazil, Hong Kong, Korea, India, Israel, Britain, Italy, Malta, Spain, Portugal and Cyprus. For example, in one study in South Africa, researchers found that the majority of young people in the sample had experienced some form of discrimination or violence. However, they also found that many young people had developed coping strategies to deal with these experiences, such as turning to religion or forming support networks. These findings suggest that young people may have a unique ability to adapt and thrive in the face of adversity.

This book investigates and explores the complex dynamics of youth in contemporary society, especially in troubled and crisis-ridden contexts. On the one hand, teenagers and young adults experience social suffering, marginalisation, gender and racial discrimination, and a lack of opportunities to develop their skills and talents.
